"What is the point? It is whether a foreign representative may refer in print to excessee of a serious nature taking place occasionally in the country to which he is accredited.

"My reply is that in principle he may not, but that if the local press is constantly reminding the public it serves, not infrequently in the most unnecessary language, of excesses of a somewhat similar nature with which this country has had to reproach itself; when the authorities are powerless or do not cars to put a stop to these attacks; when they continue in a time of disparalleled crisis, when eight nations are at war and the others in a state of dangerous excitement, then I say, that representative has doubly the right to direct attentien to those failings of the nation in whose midst he lives which place it, in one respect, on a par with his own, since by doing so he is defending the latter, which is his official duty, and is also making an effort to prevent serious mischief, which is his moral duty.

What ideas are seething in the heads of American designers will soon be apparent and I'm sure they will be satisfying. Of course, the influence of the war will dominate, as all great national affairs are bound to be reflected in the modes of the period. An appreciation of the terrible struggle in Europe, I am sure will make itself known in more dig-

By this I do not mean that sombre but the laughable extremes, the abourd and bisarre, will not be con sidered. Ecminimity and fitness will prevail among American designers and, needless to say, the styles' suitability to the American type will be first in their minds, as the French have been in the French minds, so that in the future we will not see designs inspired by Paris surrounddifferent temperaments amidst such different surroundings!

DESCRIPTION OF GOWNS.

Just now, there are some wonderfully pretty materials being shown in the shops, and the design I am showing is particularly adapted to one of the novelty striped velveteens. There are so many pretty combinations of colors that I would not attempt to suggest one, but if a line of bright blue, for instance, should be found in one, the same color taffeta or satin could be used with it for the effect shown on the figure at the left. Into an oddly cut little overbodice in jacket effect are set three-quarter-length sleeves of the silk, which are completed with tiny underpuffs of white batiste tied with a blue welvet ribbon. Another refreshing bit of white is glimpsed in the front of the waist, peeping from under the velvet over-bodice, while a dainty ruffle of it finishes the neck, softening what might prove a trying line for some faces. Below the wide sash, girdling the hips, flares a full tunic which shapes upward in back as if to reveal the more the elegance of the velveteen underskirt.

net frocks. And this design seems adorably suited to such a combination, which is shown at the right of the sketch. The sash here, too, is of velvet which accomplishes the long-waisted effect with simplicity, and the soft drooping ends in back tend to emphasize the youthfulness of the frock. That the lace underskirt may not suggest a petilocat, a band of black velvet guards its lower edge. Piquant touches of lace appear as underpuffs in the taffeta sleeves, and in the front of the bodice and at the neck.
